Key Findings

- Innovations and Other Revenue Strategies:%
  - The ability to apply knowledge and skills to new work settings
  - The ability to connect with new and industry stakeholders
  - The ability to develop and deliver information from multiple sources
  - The ability to write and present in diverse groups
  - The ability to engage in policy and program discussions

- Organizational and Professional Knowledge:%
  - The ability to identify and leverage assets
  - The ability to use and evaluate information from multiple sources
  - The ability to engage in policy and program discussions
  - The ability to write and present in diverse groups
  - The ability to develop and deliver information from multiple sources

Conclusion

In conclusion, the ability to apply knowledge and skills to new work settings is critical for professional development and organizational success. Organizations that prioritize innovation and collaboration are more likely to thrive in today's fast-paced environment.

Acknowledgements

Hart Research Associates

(6%) The ability to identify and leverage assets
(5%) The ability to use and evaluate information from multiple sources
(4%) The ability to write and present in diverse groups
(3%) The ability to engage in policy and program discussions
(2%) The ability to develop and deliver information from multiple sources
(1%) The ability to apply knowledge and skills to new work settings

Note

From October 27 to November 18, 2009, Hart Research Associates conducted 300 interviews with 250 employers and 479 employees.